

Devastated but Not Calling It Quits Even After the Breakup

Let him know that if he's not committed, you're not giving anything for free. Give him time to change and realize the good thing he had when he had you.

Life after a breakup can be confusing. Granted, you may be so devastated that you don't feel like you can do anything but you will eventually get to the point where you need to know what is a good idea and what is a bad idea when it comes to associating with your ex again.

Bad Idea:

Act Clingy. Playing the desperate "I can't do anything without you" part is a major turn off for a guy. Yes, a guy wants his girl to be dependent on him but within reason. After a breakup, this is never the time to play the damsel in distress or even the opposite overbearing mother figure.

Sleeping with him after the relationship has officially been called off. This is most certainly a bad idea because it gets in his head that he gets your body whenever he wants. He will dismiss any other cares about you and your relationship if he knows you're willing to give him his sexual satisfaction. Don't offer and don't let him ask.

Good Idea:

If you happen to run into your ex, don't ignore him because you know you're not supposed to contact him. Let him know how you're doing if he asks. It's a good idea to let him initiate contacting you and for you to not be desperate.

Give him space. Let him see what he's missing. Let him know that if he's not committed, you're not giving anything for free. Give him time to change and realize the good thing he had when he had you.

The end of all relationships have their own unique variables that may vary to exactly what each couple needs to get back together but these basic tips are certain to help the process move along.
