

Getting Your Ex Back from Someone Else's Arms

Moving on is not on the agenda because you can't stop loving and wanting him. Just because he is with someone else, it doesn't mean the door is closed and locked.

When a relationship ends, it leaves behind scars of pain, confusion and even resentment. These scars can heal and people can move on. However, sometimes moving on is not on the agenda because you can't stop loving and wanting him. It's a normal reaction to finally being alone after some time. This is even more so if you know your ex is already seeing someone else and you are left with no choices. This is not necessarily so. Just because he is with someone else, it doesn't mean the door is closed and locked. There might be a way you can get back in.

If he's already chosen to be with someone else then it's extremely likely that he's done this on the rebound. That kind of relationship is usually short-lived and is largely entered into as a temporary replacement for the serious one that has just ended and as a source of solace and support. It doesn't mean he has moved on. It means he's trying to.

Have confidence in yourself and your history together. Make a resolve to wait it out patiently and make sure he continues to see you at your best... in terms of how you look and in what you say and what you do. By doing this, it will give him strong and consistent reminders of everything he ever saw in you. Then, if his fledgling relationship is indeed failing to take flight, those reminders might be the things that send him back into your arms. As the saying goes, you never know what you've got till it's gone.
