Vitiligo is a chronic skin condition that supports loss of coloring, resulting in uneven pale patches of skin. Research states that it is a detailed type of leukoderma manifested characteristically by dipegmentation of epidermis. Clinically, it is distinguished by white macules on the skin that can be few or numerous. It has been proved as a state whereby the immune system is activated to react against and attack the body's own tissues and may happen next to other diseases such as thyroid disease or pernicious anemia. The customary category of vitiligo is called 'Vitiligo Vulgaris' also known as common vitiligo. Alternative types include linear, segmental, trachoma and inflammatory vitiligo.

The factual cause of vitiligo is still argued. The condition is principally more obvious externally in individuals with darker skin types. <http://www.curevitiligooil.com> The clear-cut cause of vitiligo is complex and not known yet. There is evidence that suggest it is caused by an amalgamation of auto-immune, genetic, and environmental factors. But, it has not been proved worldwide. Several people consider having a link between sunburn and vitiligo. A current hypothesis put forward the cause that vitiligo occurs because people develop antibodies that are harmful to the unique cells which produce melanin in the body.

There is no precisely sufficient proof as to why the vitiligo skin condition occurs or what causes it. Vitiligo is often found in people who also show signs of diseases relating to autoimmune disorders. These disorders also tend to run in families, which builds up an idea that vitiligo itself is a hereditary problem. But, most people who develop this skin condition are not born with it but extend it in later life.

This disease normally has an effect on an estimated 1% of the world's population. It affects individuals of all ethnic origins and both sexes, but is much more easily observed on darker skin as areas that fail to tan. It is hereditary in one third of those affected. Vitiligo often starts on the hands, feet or face, and frequently pigment loss is progressive. Half the patients first notice vitiligo before 20 years of age.

There are certain psychological effects occurring due to this disease. Beauty always assumes blemish free skin. People suffering from such skin disorders like vitiligo experience problems in social connections. The eccentric remarks from strangers are the most unlikable and hurting. It produces low self- esteem and feelings of inferiority and these psychological reactions are not predictable already.

The research shows that Vitiligo is a harmful disease that stresses an individual externally and internally i.e. physically and mentally (psychosomatic reactions).
